Customer Reviews

I'm really impressed by Ray Edward's How to Write Copy that Sells: The Step-by-Step System for More Sales, to More Customers, More Often. How to Write Copy that Sells offers a wealth of practical, easy-to-locate and apply, advice in a "right-sized package" that comfortably fits in your hand or laptop case when traveling. Ray's "system" is explained in terms of the 12 building blocks of copy that, together, cover the various types of projects today's entrepreneurs and marketers are likely to need. are likely to In today's busy world. Each chapter begins with an explanation of the type of project, i.e., Chapter 2's "Magic Building Blocks of the Perfect Sales Letter" or a particular technique, like Chapter 5's "How to Write Bullet Points that Virtually Force Your Prospects to Buy.") After a brief description of the relevance of the material in each chapter, Ray breaks up the remainder of the chapter into specific, actionable ways to put the information to work. To maintain the flow of information, Ray helpfully sets apart definitions and terms that some readers might not be familiar with, allowing other readers to proceed directly to the action tips. The tips and techniques--the meat and potatoes of the book--are set apart by numbered subheads. Careful writing and editing has condensed most tips to between a half and a full page...long enough to show readers how to use and profit from the advice, but no longer than necessary. Best of all, each chapter ends with Quick Summary of the ideas shared in the chapter. More important, How to Write Copy that Sells's content extends beyond the book; each chapter contains links to bonus content templates and tutorials on Ray's site (no credit card required).
